

Lipids: Steroids

Steroids are characterized by a carbon skeleton consisting of four fused rings. Different steroids are distinguished by the chemical groups attached to these rings.

Steroids serve a variety of functions, including acting as signaling molecules.

Cholesterol is a crucial molecule in animals, as it is a common component in membranes. It is also the precursor from which other steroids are synthesized.

